In 1860 the only zoological gardens in the United States were in Baltimore and New York. Many of the zoological gardens in this country are free to the public. In Europe none are free save the Jardin des Plantes in Paris.. Some of our zoological gardens are maintained by amusement parks or street railways, but a majority of them are kept up by cities. The Bronx Park Zoo in New York and the Philadelphia Zoological Gardens are kept up by zoological societies, while the National Zoological Park in Washington is main tained in part by the Federal government, under a special act of Congress passed in 1890. These three gardens are the most important in this country, from a scien-

Aside from the Jardin des Plantes, the European gardens make no concessions to the public except a reduction of admission fees on holidays and Saturdays. The result is that the poor are practically excluded, while in America they enjoy the Episcopal Church, at Browningsville, this county, benefits of the exhibitions. So great is was opened with special services to-day, having been the crush of people in the Jardin des Plantes that there is often danger to the barriers which protect the cages. Generally speaking, European zoological gardens pay dividends, while those in America are an expense. An exception to the rule in this country is the Cincinnati Zoo, which has made money recently, although it has had hard times in its career. In most of the gardens of Europe the restaurant concession pays handsomely. In Berlin the restaurant privileges are leased fo $15,000 a year, and the restaurant is in

William T. Hornaday, director of the New York Zoological Society, and an authority upon natural history, says the American gardens should have both highpriced and low-priced restaurants, concert halls, plenty of shade and flowers, immunity from political interference, and the moral support of the wealthy and intellectual classes in every city. it is possible, inclosures should be large enough to admit of animals being kept in something approaching their natural state. In the average park the inclosures are too small to and contented, and in the great preserves they are hidden in the forests. One of the chief reasons for the need of commodious quarters is that of economy Where spaces are too small the death rate is high.
